

As a 10th-grade entrepreneur who owns a clothing line, I am deeply committed to promoting equity and equality within my industry. My business journey has been shaped not only by my passion for fashion but also by a desire to support small Black businesses in accessing vital resources. My ultimate goal is to one day establish my own clothing manufacturing company, and I believe that fostering inclusivity in this field is crucial for future generations of entrepreneurs.

One of the key equity goals I strive for is to ensure that small Black businesses have greater accessibility to funding and lenders. Many entrepreneurs from underrepresented backgrounds face significant barriers when seeking financial support to start or expand their businesses. This disparity often stems from systemic issues that have historically marginalized Black-owned businesses. By advocating for initiatives that provide easier access to capital, I hope to empower others in my community to pursue their entrepreneurial dreams. Creating partnerships with local lenders and organizations that focus on minority entrepreneurship is a vital step toward achieving this goal.

In my journey as a young entrepreneur, I often reflect on the sacrifices and struggles of those who came before me. Figures like Rosa Parks have paved the way for my ability to own a clothing line at just 14 years old. Parks' courage in standing up against racial injustice not only sparked significant social change but also serves as an inspiration for me to challenge the status quo in the fashion industry. Her legacy reminds me that perseverance in the face of adversity can lead to meaningful progress. Just as Parks fought for equality, I strive to create a brand that uplifts and supports my community, ensuring that every voice is heard and valued.

Additionally, I aim to foster equality within my business by prioritizing diversity in my supply chain and marketing efforts. I believe that representation matters, not just in the products we offer but also in the stories we tell. By collaborating with diverse designers and showcasing models of different backgrounds, I want to ensure that my clothing line reflects the richness of our society. This commitment to equality not only strengthens my brand but also helps to create a more inclusive environment in the fashion industry.

As I continue to grow my clothing line and work toward my goal of becoming a clothing manufacturer, I remain dedicated to advocating for equity and equality. I believe that by working together, we can create a more inclusive economy where everyone has the opportunity to succeed. With the inspiration of trailblazers like Rosa Parks guiding my path, I am excited to contribute to a future where small Black businesses can thrive and make a lasting impact on the world.
